THE DAILY STORY.That Emerald Bracelet.

(Copyright, 1913, by W. W. Weller.)

There were times when Aline Hackett wished that fate had not made her Aunt Jane's favorite niece and an orphan. Since Aunt Jane had a big, comfortable house and Aline as a stenographer could command only a moderate salary, it would have been foolish and ungrateful to live in a hall bedroom instead of accepting Aunt Jane's kindly offer. But Aunt Jane never could understand that Aline's employer growled when she used more than sixty minutes at noon, and four days out of six she calmly gave the girl a list of articles to be purchased that took every second of that noon hour.

And, moreover, her aunt did not like John Haddon, a young lawyer, who spent every other evening in Aunt Jane's parlor talking to Aline.

"I don't know what it is," she remarked, squinting through her spectacles at the big photograph of him which stood on Aline's dressing table, "but he linery and hurried away before he had seen her.

She found the hostess counter. But I'll take 'em back and give her a piece of my mind."

"Oh," gasped Aline, and then she colored and laughed. "I—I believe I wasn't thinking."

"What were you thinking about?" Aunt Jane demanded. "Do you mean to say, Aline, that you went and asked for green stockings?"

Aline, with crimson face and shining eyes, stammered an explanation. "And it was such a lovely bracelet, Aunt Jane, I wish Wednesday would hurry," she concluded.

Aline received the explanation in grim silence. She cleared away the dinner dishes before she spoke. "I hate to tell you, but Mrs. Carter told me that he's been with twice to see that silly yellow-haired Milly Andrews this last week. I don't know what any sensible man could see in that chit, with her popping blue eyes and sick stockings that she's so afraid every one won't see."

Aline suppressed a smile. It was precisely what Aline had said to John. "Mrs. Carter was a notorious gossip. Aunt Jane usually refused to credit the old lady's slightest word."

Presently the doorbell rang and Aunt Jane, with a heavy frown, ushered John into the parlor, shot a grim glance at said as plainly as words, "I'd ship him in a jiffy," and then withdrew, with a hot water bottle for her neuralgia and a volume of Openheim for her diversion.

John did not speak of the bracelet, but knowledge of it made Aline happily constrained. She had wanted a bracelet for a long time, yet she had never mentioned such a longing to John. It was a good augury that he could divine her wishes. She could hardly keep from showing her gratitude for the bracelet.

The next two nights John did not appear. He had told her that he was immersed in an important case and she was not expecting him. Nor was she expecting Milly Andrews, who ran in shortly after 6 o'clock. Milly, as a rule, kept her evenings for the other sex. Only occasionally did she visit Aline, although the two had come to school together and lived only three blocks apart. Aline did not care much for her, but she looked at her with ungrudging admiration. Milly had a lovely face; her cheeks were like satin pink petals and her eyes were blue violet. Her neck was soft and white and so were her arms.

Aline looked at them as appreciatively as she would have looked at a marble, and then she stiffened and all the blood in her body seemed to pound its way to her head, and she lovely round arm the lace sleeve fell away to show a bracelet, heavily embossed and emerald set. Aline looked at the glance and laughed consciously.

"Isn't it exquisite?" she asked, with unaffected delight.

"Yes," said Aline, dully. "A new one?"

"I've had it just one day," Milly said with pride.

Aunt Jane's eyes, though old, were very sharp, especially where Aline was concerned. She had seen the look of hurt wonder before the girl had masked it with indifference. She remembered Aline's description of an emerald bracelet. "Who gave it to you?" she demanded, plainly, of Milly. There was a distinctly hostile intonation in her voice.

"But Milly did not perceive it. She laughed and the affected, rather concealed glance that Aunt Jane frankly detected—"for a while," she was not telling people, and won't you all be surprised when you learn how frivolous Milly has captured."

She shot Aunt Jane a gay defiant glance that betrayed her knowledge of the austere lady's opinion of her pretty self.

But Aline was firm, and finally Milly, in a very bad humor, left.

"I knew he was a scamp," Aunt Jane began, wrathfully. "I told you the villain."

"Aunt Jane," Aline began, her face white and all the happy light gone from her eyes. "I don't want to hear anything. After all, he never told me that he cared for me."

He looked it! And a lying look is as bad as words.

Aline fled to her room. There was no way to stop Aunt Jane's tongue once it had started,
